The Grand Canal is the main waterway of the noble and ancient city of Venice. Fully two miles long, and with an average width of 75 yards, it intersects the city from north-west to south-east. A trip on the Grand Canal is a most interesting experience; handsome houses and palaces, each with a remarkable history, line its banks (for this is the street where the old aristocracy lived), and upon its waters float a continuous and varied stream of small steamboats, gondolas and other craft.
